The earliest and most extreme form of hedonism is that of the Cyrenaics as stated by Aristippus, who argued that the goal of a good life should be the sentient pleasure of the moment. Since, as Protagoras maintained, knowledge is solely of momentary sensations, it is useless to try to calculate future pleasures and to balance pains against them. The true art of life is to crowd as much ...

In our scientific age, we look to the biologists to define 'life' for us. After all, it is their subject matter. I believe they have yet to reach consensus, but a biological definition would be something like, 'Life is an arrangement of molecules with qualities of self-sustenance and self-replication'.
